Addendum to "Cairn Gorm and the funicular – unravel HIE and CMSL's latest spin"

Description

Tautological topography

WHY is such tautologous nonsense as "Cairngorm Mountain" indulged in? Cairngorm is a mountain, full stop. Its very name states so. It requires no further descriptor.

In Wales, we have the psychobabble of "Mount" Snowdon. Nearer home, in Banchory, there's a recently-erected signpost identifying "Scolty Hill". Scolty is a hill, and has been simply a hill since I was a boy. Quite possibly the name has identified it as a hill for a few generations before that too.

Gordon Casely, Crathes.

Take Cairn Gorm away from HIE

GORDON Casely (Letters,

November 17) is right that "Cairngorm Mountain" is tautologous nonsense. He has, however, fallen for the other half of Highland and Island Enterprise's marketing speak quoted in Martin Williams's otherwise excellent article on the soaring cost of the funicular repairs ("Costs of Cairngorm [sic] railway spiral ahead of 2023 opening". The Herald, November 16). "Cairn" means a heap of stones in Gaelic, an apt description for the mountain whose name is Cairn Gorm, not Cairngorm.

Sadly Highland and Island Enterprise (HIE) has shown as little respect for Gaelic culture at Cairn Gorm as it has for the mountain environment. This it has repeatedly dug up at enormous financial cost for a number of ill-conceived projects and with no regard to the risks.
Having sacrificed most of the ski lifts at Cairn Gorm for the funicular railway, if HIE is allowed to keep going one day the whole heap of stones may just slide down into Glen More below.

None of this is the fault of the Scottish minister now responsible for HIE, Ivan McKee, who has inherited a massive financial hole from his predecessor, Fergus Ewing. Mr McKee, however, should now have been in post long enough to realise he now needs to instigate a process to put an end to HIE's disastrous tenure and transfer the land at Cairn Gorm to new owners.

Insisting HIE started to call the mountain by its proper name would be a sign of good intentions.

Nick Kempe, Glasgow.

A large proportion of my campaigning to improve Scotland's National Parks takes place behind the scenes and doesn't appear on parkswatch, partly due to the time involved but also because there are limits to what blogging can achieve. Other media is very important which is why I am so appreciative of the Strathy, an excellent local paper of whose like we need more, but it is often very difficult to get issues picked up by the national media even in the most scandalous cases like HIE's mismanagement of Cairn Gorm.

To see the Herald, therefore, not just picking up on the costs of the funicular repairs but actively working to make these public as they have done over the last year is most gratifying. Their story earlier this week (see here) provides independent evidence which helps campaigners expose HIE's spin for what it is as I tried to do yesterday (see here). I had no contact with Martin Williams on this and his story came as a pleasant surprise. Gordon Casely's follow up letter then opened a new angle of criticism which was too much to resist! Having written the letter Friday afternoon I was not expecting it to appear the same day as my post.

The current £25m repair bill (originally costed by HIE at £16m) should be added to the £26m cost of building the funicular in the year 2000 (originally costed by HIE at £14m) with additional maintenance costs over 20 plus years. We have now reached the stage where this funicular railway has so far cost well in excess of £50m and counting. Most of this money has and will come from the public purse. What happened to the huge profits the funicular was supposed to generate, according to HIE's fairy tale predictions? It is worth repeating the comment Dave Morris made on the post:

"In November 1997 the Secretary of State for Scotland, Donald Dewar MP, approved a payment of £9 million by HIE towards the construction of the funicular railway. This approval came with a condition: "there should be no further financial contribution to the project from the Secretary of State, whether through HIE or otherwise". At that time HIE had fooled too many people into believing that the funicular would generate so much profit that no further public funds would be required on the mountain to meet annual running costs or future capital investment. HIE knew this was a lie but deliberately manipulated all the key political decision makers, in Scotland and the European Commission, to put a white elephant on the mountain in place of the promised magic money tree. Many £millions of public money will continue to be poured into this cess pit until the day that a Scottish politician orders HIE to remove default Waterm itself from Cairn Gorm."
